Automatic digitizer devices have had a wide use in computer systems for controlling various things. These devices digitize a two dimensional area by translating the position of a stylus or the like onto electrical pulses and converting the pulses into digital data. To aid the stylus in arriving at an exact position on the digitizing surface of the digitizer, the digitizer usually includes an optically reflective surface, such as a white paper surface, and a light source to illuminate the paper. The stylus is usually an elongated, pen-like device containing a light sensor, and a transmitter/receiver for transmitting the position of the stylus and a digital signal describing the position to a computer. The computer typically processes the position data to achieve a digital image of the area selected by the stylus. In most cases, a digitizer of this type is two dimensional, meaning f678ea9f9c
